...TEXT: Maryland in College Park.

Using conventional data mining tools, finding patterns of cell death and stock performance or any other time-series data has been difficult.

Hochheiser's TimeFinder software has a visual interface that lets users manipulate simple graphical tools to query huge databases and then lets them see the results represented on a graph.

One mouse click replaces the typing of multiple parameters , reducing procedure time and the chance of introducing errors.

A user clicks the mouse to...
...on an empty graph with defined axes, say, with time on the X axis and stock price on the Y. Thus, the user poses a query , such as, "Show me all stocks with prices between $50 and $75 at the end of last September." A second window then shows a list of each stock that meets that criterion.

By drawing more boxes, a user can refine his query to get only stocks whose prices then rose 50% by January and fell by 75% by March.

Andrew Woelflein, a London-based financial analyst, recently saw the software demonstrated. "This is great," he says. "With this, I could query the data directly. Right now, this is the kind of query you submit to the analysts, and they get back to you in maybe a day. You change the parameters , then it's another day. With this, I could get the answer immediately."

To build...

...report depending on what company and industry is in the news.

In a free form search, a user can input a random set of criteria to compare a certain set of measures, for example: a computer hardware company that trades...

...billion and three-year shareholder return greater than or equal to 30%. After entering these criteria, the free form search brings up Compaq, Hewlett Packard and IBM.

A structured search allows for comparison across five categories including company description, size, financial benchmarks and operational benchmarks such as sales growth and shareholder and value returns.

The system...
